Canyon Glen Park is back under the control of Provo, after 20 years of operation by Utah County, and now it has a new look.

Gone is the wooden sign that heralded the 10-acre park as a county-run facility. It has been replaced by an attractive rock sign that designates the popular Provo Canyon recreational area as a municipal park.

But the sign, which was sand-blasted and painted to color-coordinate with its surrounding environs, isn't the only change at the park since it reverted back to city control Jan. 1. The lawn is green once again, courtesy of a new water pump installed over the summer by the city.

There are other plans to replace the rickety bridge over the Provo River, fix the amphitheater and renovate the picnic areas and pavilions.

"Unfortunately, like in every department, sometimes the funds get a little thin," said Provo Parks and Recreation Director Roger Thomas, referring to the years Canyon Glen was under county control. "As a result, maybe the maintenance level of the park was not up to where either the county or the city hoped it could have been."

On June 30, 1975, Canyon Glen was leased to the county for 20 years on a no-cost basis. Mayor George Stewart explained that at that time it made perfect sense because the city had no other parks in Provo Canyon to maintain. With the creation of the model South Fork Park several years ago, and with the onset of construction of another nearby, city officials decided to take control of Canyon Glen once again when the county's lease expired.

"The park hasn't been kept up to the standard that we would like to see," said Stewart. "In talking with the county, I understand it is because they have a budget crunch with the new jail. They don't have near the revenue that the city does."

The Provo Parks and Recreation Department has 30 parks, roughly three times the number owned and operated by the county. The city also has several springs that are an integral part of its water supply near Canyon Glen. Stewart said maintaining the park gives the city greater control over the important water source.

In conjunction with resuming operation of the park, the city is conducting a survey of the area. Thomas said more land in Canyon Glen can be converted into usable recreation space.
